Snobbishness Modern Young Man's Greatest Fault—Weddings—Notes Hostesses in Society Say Harsh Things About Him—Sewing Classes Prepare to Begin Their Annual Work for the Poor—Engage- ments of Debutantes

Social stock taking is in full swing at the moment, and it is known social stock taking is a mighty serious business that chimes in well with Lent. There is in the last few days before Ash Wednesday it is not remarkable that every one should go about—that is, the hosts and hostesses of the winter—with a certain nervous expression and a decidedly absent minded manner. Upon this stock taking depends among other things the decision as to the trip West or South—this year the European trip is distinctly unfashionable, or whether it will be best to stay on at home and try what New York itself can furnish in the way of amusements.

Social stock taking begins first of all with the calculation whether it has paid to entertain this person or that person; whether the money and time and energy expended on entertaining people simply because they will entertain or did entertain in return was a good investment. Often this requires careful figuring.

One point that every hostess of this winter seems to agree upon is that the entertaining of the average young man has proved about the poorest investment possible. For some unknown reason the snobbishness of the average dancing man—that is, of the younger set—has attained a pitch of snobbishness, to use a kindly phrase, that is almost insufferable, and this among men whose parents have certainly given them every advantage of school and home training.

Apparently there is a dearth of eligible young men, otherwise there could be no reason for the attention paid to these same young men when they pay not the slightest heed to any social convention, such as calling after an entertainment or making themselves in the least agreeable at either dinner or dance. It was said that one of the reasons why the cotillon was given up was that the men would not ask the girls to dance, that they preferred to dance "stag," as they call it, meaning that they stood in solid phalanx at the door of the ballroom and danced only as they chose and with whom they chose, saying that to take a partner for the evening was a good chance to see what she looks like, and it is a awful fact, for a fellow to know a lot of girls who aren't attractive. This is absolutely a true statement of the occurrence, and there are many others of the same kind.

The hostesses of the present day who attempt to introduce the young men to the girls at a dance is politely but firmly told "You will have to excuse me. I really don't care to meet any more girls." At a dance last week one young man who is considered extremely eligible said when asked by his hostess to be presented to a young girl: "Oh, excuse me; I really haven't had a good chance to see what she looks like, and it is a awful fact, for a fellow to know a lot of girls who aren't attractive." This is absolutely a true statement of the occurrence, and there are many others of the same kind.

To accept an invitation for a dance and at the last moment to go is nothing. It is a rule of the young men to accept all invitations and then to look in at the dance for a few minutes, or to stay away if anything better turns up, without any regard to the fact that they are causing to be vacant places that otherwise would have been filled by other men, leaving the hostess with a lot more girls than men, which is never quite the thing at a dance.

The supper provided is never regarded as sufficient, however liberal it may be as regards wine and cigars, and the signal to leave the supper room is not considered at all obligatory by the young men, who if they pay their partners the compliment of taking them back into the ballroom return with the swiftness of homing pigeons to the banquet hall, where they remain for the rest of the evening. If the entertainment is given in a public place, as are most of the late entertainments, and the supper is not to their taste then it is quite the correct thing in their view to go down to the public restaurant and order whatever is desired.

That the hostesses of New York have put up with this sort of manners, or lack of manners, seems extraordinary, but in order to have the number of men required they consider apparently that there is nothing to do but to accept the situation and bide their time. But it does seem strange that the parents of these same young fellows do not take the matter in hand and insist upon better behavior.

It does not seem credible that the men themselves should fail to realize the mistake they are making, and it can be questioned if any other city in the world would stand for such a thing. The girls take it all as a matter of course. Their maids always wait in the dressing room, so that if no partner is forthcoming for supper, or the dance a girl can go home without feeling herself in a least conspicuous. It is not at all as it used to be, when for a girl to be left in this manner without a partner marked her as an utter failure.

In contradistinction there are, of course, many girls who have a good feeling of superiority, but it must be confessed that these same girls require an enormous amount of entertaining in the way of dinners, parties and so forth in order to make them at all dependable, and they do not hesitate to say that if another invitation comes that is better it will be accepted.

Not part of the stock taking is not entertaining work, but there are a few inventories that hold elements of pleasure. The winter, take it all in all, has been far savor than was expected, and although the entertaining has been principally for the debutantes it has been a very charming kind of entertaining. Now that the debutantes are debutantes no longer
